

The following are some examples of academic dishonesty and possible sanctions:

- A graduate student copies a homework solution from the internet. The student receives a zero for the assignment and a reduction of one letter grade within the course.
- Two undergraduate students copy from one another on a final examination. Both receive an "F" for the course.
- A student cheats on examination two different times in a course. Student receives an "F" for the course and is suspended from the University.
- A student lies to instructor about credit received on an examination. Student receives an "F" for the course and is suspended from the University.
- Two undergraduate students copy code from one another on a laboratory assignment. Both receive a zero for the assignment.
- A graduate student copies material from other sources in a thesis without proper documentation. The student is dismissed from the graduate program.
- Six students copy from one another during an exam. The students receive an "F" for the course and are suspended from the university for one semester.
- Four of the six students do something similar in another course. The students receive an "F" for the course and are suspended from the university for a calendar year.
- Five students copy a homework solution from the internet. The students receive a zero for the assignment and a reduction of one letter grade within the course.
- Two students copy from one another a programming homework assignment. Both receive zero for the assignment.
- Student copies from another student during an exam. Receives "F" for the exam.