

Book X.
Title XXXVII.

Concerning payment of salary.
(De praebendo salario.)

10.37.1. Emperor Constantine to Marcellinus, Count of the Orient.

No salary shall be paid from the city treasury to anyone except a person to whom it has been specially granted by order.

Given at Constantinople October 3 (349).

C. Th. 12.2.1.

Note.

The voting of salaries to persons practicing the liberal arts and medicine seems to have been an exception to the rule of the foregoing law. D. 50.9.4. Officials of the city served without pay. Municipalities were in later times more and more under the control of the imperial government, although, as shown by note to C. 10.30.4, Justinian realized that the supervision had gone too far and sought to instill some vigor into municipal life, by creating a board of audit in each city and forbidding central authorities from interfering.
