The close of the 2025-26 academic year is just around the corner, and our School and Class of 2026 are eager for graduation. On behalf of the School's Experiential Office, thank you for your contributions to our students' success. We recognize that precepting requires substantial commitment, and we appreciate the expertise and time you invest in our students. We are truly grateful for your dedication; our program could not succeed without your collaboration.

Rotations for the Class of 2027 and 2029 begin in May. This transition is an ideal time to reflect on potential enhancements to your rotations and individual preceptorship. Student feedback is a valuable tool for this growth. At the end of each block, students provide preceptor and site feedback via CORE, which our office distributes bi-annually. We encourage you to review these reports to identify successful trends and opportunities for adjustment.

Facilitating Feedback: the gift of receiving

Communicating feedback can be challenging; receiving it can be even harder. While we are accustomed to evaluating student performance, we also rely on their perspective. Whether through formal end-of-rotation evaluations or informal check-ins such as 'How was the rotation?' or 'What could have been done differently to support your learning experience?' the process can sometimes lead to feedback burnout and often doesn't work the way we intended, especially when the input feels negative. However, feedback is essential to refining our skills as educators.

To help you navigate this, we are pleased to highlight a free continuing education course offered through CE Impact. In the course "Using Feedback to Improve Your Precepting," Dr. Nicholas Cox, Clinical Assistant Professor at The University of Utah College of Pharmacy, introduces "deliberate practice" strategies to help you "prepare for, react to, and engage with feedback more effectively."

This one-hour, on-demand session explores using metacognition to mitigate the triggers that often interfere with receiving feedback; ultimately enhancing teaching satisfaction and professional practice.
